This is a subject not generally under-tood by the great mass of farmers, broughout its various bearings. All know they can fatten a hog or cow by feeding grain or vegetables enough; but as to the best, cheapest, and most profit-shle mode among many people, lit le is known. As at this time of the year more attention is paid to the fattening of snimals, than at any other time, a few hints with regard to it, will not be whol-

Animals intended for the butcher should Animals intended for the butcher should be kept quiet. They should have no more exercise than is necessary for their health, as more than this calls for a greater amount of food, while the process of er amount of food, while the process of fattening is delayed. Animals should be fed regularly with a proper amount of proper food. Should they not be fed at regular intervals, it will tend to make them uneasy and discontented, and they will not thrive. When they are fed with apples or pumpkins, it should be in their season, and not when they have lost their goodness by decay or frost. This rule may always be observed, that the least nutritious articles should be fed first, and the most nutritive afterwards. Of the root crops, for fattening properties, pota- can obtained for at any other establishment in toes stand first, carrots next, and ruta-bagas, mangel-wurtzels and flat turnips fol-low on in their order. Of grain, wheat is first, Indian corn, pess and bar'ey are the next. Probably more corn is used than any other grain, especially for swine; it seems to be peculiarly adapted for the fattening of pork. There is a great gain in having it ground, cooked and scalded. No grain should be fed without one or both of these being done, as animals are more quiet and contented, and therefore gain flesh much faster. I am confident that food is as much better for swine and cattle, for being cooked, as it is for man. When animals are first put up for fattening, care should be taken that grain of fond of the bivalves. They will be served up in great nutritive properties should be fed every style. His saloon is fitted up in suitable with caution, as the appetite is generally style for Lades, Parties, &c. great, and over-feeding them with such grain will hurt them. The best plan that I know of, is to mix lighter grains and have them ground together. Cornmeal possesses great nutrilive properties, and animals will fatten faster on it than almost any other grain; but it will not answer to feed them wholly on this for a great length of time. Animals when full fed upon meal, sometimes become dyspeptic, a disease similar to that sometimes affecting our own species. Hence we see Canton and Brittania Matting. ## Fall Plowing.

It is said that the lands in the Sciota Valley, Ohio, which have yielded large crops of corn for many years in succession, without being manured, are able to sustain this enormous draft in consequence of the fineness of the soil; all its component parts being as fine as flour. We believe there are other causes, but if this is erty by applying to their agent, WM. W. DRENNAN, sen it teaches us, with regard to our lands. The autumn plowing of stubble ground is not generally practised by our farmers. Some object, because they say, when the land is light the wind blows off planting. But if pulverization is so important, it will far over balance hese ob jections, admitting that they are valid, which we are not inclined to do.

We believe the atmosphere to be the great store-house of fertilizers, and ready at all times to impart them to such parts of the earth as are ready to receive them. If the surface is smooth, hard and crusty, it cannot catch the gasses as they psss, or imbibe the dews and rain with their rich ammonia; they pass on to a more genial soil, where the doors are open to let them in, and where they find friends and agreeable occupation.

We believe a corn or grain field well-plowed in the fall, and turned up to the kindly influence of the sun at d air, to be equal to a moderate manuring, taken in connection with the decaying stubble that is turned under by the operation.
